So Mad You Could Smell Him. The Rev. L F. Drake rushes into print as an apologist of the recent conference of the M. E. Church beld at Jonesborough, and the Knoxville Whig of the 23rd contains a letter of length directed against the Press and Messenger, and the article which that journal had copied from the Bristol News in reference to the "Sacramental occasion, on the second day of the Gonference." The Doctor seems to think he is on a bird hunt, and aims to fire the small shot of his fowling-piece into men which is destined to supercede the the ranks of the enemy, whom he expeets to stampede. But like the flintburied the old Virginia. He is about lock maskets used by Southern soldiers, it does more mischief to the man who fires it than to him upon whom it is fired. He works himself into quite a furore, and gets "so mad that you could single him." Toward the close of his letter he says :

The idea of any one in that large and re spectable andience being "mad" is perfect by preposterous, and at the same time it by preposerous, and at the same time it is unitate. Why the Bristol News' correspondent had such a baseless article published is very strange, indeed. His vision must have been dim and his mind very much demented. The sight of that burly negro must have thrown such a shade over his mind as to have produced hallucination of the brain. He tries to cover up the whole thing in brackets, and wants it read in a low voice, and to be passed over burriedly, The pegroes did start forward with the whites, Drake met and turned them aside, remarking, " Brethren, just take a seat there." Does he deny this? Does he deny administering the Sacra ment to the pegroes a little thereafter, and that one of them left the church? eDes he deny inviting the whites for ward after this? Does he deny that many of his congregation were so offend ed that they would not commune? If he is going to deny these things, we
